The Singular Patagonia wasn't the first luxury-adventure lodge to bring adrenaline-fueled days and evenings of fine wine and food to the rugged, nearly uninhabited wilds of southern Chile. But it is the most, well, singular: It occupies a onetime sheep-processing factory, looks like a barn from first approach, and requires guests to traverse intact furnace areas, engine rooms, and tannery facilities on their way to their rooms or to dinner. Now that prison hotels and bank hotels are old news, sleeping in a meat locker still feels like a novelty.
